MY HUSBAND'S SECRET.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

"But," said Maria Provost, unyieldingly, "a husband ought not to have any secrets from his wife."

"You are mistaken, my child," re turned her mother. "There may be many things which a man ought to keep from his wife.-In matters of business he should not bring all his troubles into his house, nor burden the mind of his companion with things which she could understand just e nough to fret her, and of which she could understand no more. And then a man may have secrets confided to him by a friend, which in honor, he is bound to keep to himself."

But Maria Provost could not think so; or, at least she pretended that she could not. She had been married nearly three years, and yet this was the first cloud that had come upon her. Her husband had received a let ter on the previous evening-a man had it to the door dwelling,-and when she had asked him what it was about, he told it was only a business matter; but she saw that it was something which interested him very much and she knew it must be of importance; so she demanded to know what the letter contained. Finally her husband told her that he could not ex plain the matter to her then, but that at some time she should know all a bout it. When she found that he was not to be moved she became very sul len and morose, and allowed hersel to suffer all sorts of suspicious and evil imaginings. It so happened that her mother came to visit her on the day following; and of course the parent could not be long in discovering something was wrong; for her child was usually so happy and so blithe some that this cloud was quickly apparent. And when Mrs. Wilson had learned the cause of her daughter's trouble, she tried to show her how wrong it was to feel so. But Maria appeared unwilling to see the matter as her mother would present it.

"Tell me, my child," said Mrs. Wil son; "do you not know that your hus cried the young wife, quickly. "He does trust you with every thing proper, He may have the best of reasons for keeping the contents of that letter to himself. It may be the secret of some friend who is in trouble; it may be a confession of wrong from poor one, who had on your husband's thrown his forbearan many thing part at once his honor. which leads him to be so true and he became nervous, and wisely left me.

think so now."

"I know he is one of the best of fathers," interposed Maria, with much

"Aye," responded her mother, "and one of the best of men. When we were first married he was just commencing in business, and I had the pleasure of knowing that he was not only succeeding very well, but he made me feel that I was a great help to him. We had been married almost two years, and there had never been noon I heard my husband come into the front entry, and go up stairs. He went very lightly, but I knew his step; and, in a halt playful mood, I ran up the back way to meet him. I found him in the little library, and he was just putting something into one of the private drawers of his secretary. I could see that it was a small package very neatly done up in white paper, with writing upon it. And I saw more, too. I saw that Charles was quite nervous, and that he was quite anxious to conceal the package from me, for he slipped it away very quickly, and then closed the drawer and ocked it; and when I asked him what it was, he tried to smile, and told me that I mustn't know. "But I was not to be put off thus. I told him that he must tell me what it was that he had concealed in that drawer. He kissed me and bade me curb my curiosity, telling me that, perhaps, at some time, I might know all about it. Still I would not be put off. I demanded to know then. I should creep into the house in such a clandestine manner, and try to hide things away from his wife. If it was any present he had received from some of the females who had loved him before I married him; or, if it was only old love-letters, he needn't be afraid to show it. But he would tell me nothing; and when I began to upbraid him, he turned and left me.

"And now the cloud had come. I allowed myself to worry over the matter, and I cannot begin to tell half of the suspicions that found life in my bosom. My husband may have kept many secrets from me before, but this was the first instance I had detected, and it became a great matter to me .-When he came home in the evening I was silent and morose; and, when I was forced to answer him, I was by no means pleasant. I did not stop to consider how kind and confiding he had always been; nor did I remember how noble and honorable he was. only thought of the secret of that mysterious package he had hidden away from me, and I was determined -perhaps I had not really made such a plan, but such was the fact-I had determined that I would be miserable, and that I would make him miserable, too, until he confessed to me what was in the hidden packet. Before we went to bed that night he asked me if I was still thinking of the scene in the library, and when I admitted that I was, hort, there may be he asked me if I could not have confihe could not im- dence enough in his truth and love to joined him in the atting-room. ut sacrificing trust him I answered, rather sullenly, mber my dear, that that he had no right to keep a secret ity of heart and soul from his wife. As I showed ill-heling

I had learned the secret, and as my husband once kept from me?

I was an incompany of the secret and as my husband once kept from me?

I thought so then, and I There was a spirit within me which once if the money was not paid; whispered to me that I was acting the letter of the previous evening was very foolishly. It told me what a good, from a lawyer, informing him of the kind man my husband was-it told me that I bught to know that he was not willing to do anything which could give me pain or uneasiness-it told me that I ought to trust him. But I would not be convinced. I had gone so far that I would not retract. To me passed another evening of pain and unpleasantness.

"On the morning of the next day, after we had eaten our breakfast, my a cloud upon our home. One after- husband came to me, and kissed me on the forehead.

'Is it not your birthday?' he said. "I told him it was. It was strange that I should have forgotten it, but such was the fact.

"And then he took a package from his bosom-it was the very one I had said to me:-

Maria Provost was deeply affected by her mother's story, as was evident, not only from the tears she shed, but from the fact that she had no reply to make. "I was startled and surprised," continued Mr. Provost, "for I had not the least idea what it could all mean. Of course, I would not tell you of it Maria, for it could only have wor ried and tormented you, a d that, too, without just cause. Could I have explained the matter, and shown you that there was no danger, I should have done so at once, but I could not explain it even to myself; and I must own that I was a little worried. However, it's all right now. I have been over to Damonville, where I found ten thousand dollars worth of notes with my name upon the back of them. Of course it was a forgery, as I soon convinced the holders,"

"And are you clear of it all?" asked Maria, eagerly, at the same time putting her arm about her husband's neck.

"Yes. It was John Clarkson, my old clerk, who did it; and they have now turned their attention towards his arrest, though I doubt if they will seen him hide in the drawer-and he gain anything if they find him, for he is saddly fallen. And now, my dear, confess to me that you were very much provoked because I would not show you the letter last evening."

"I was; but-forgive me, and I will never do so again."

"Because." added the husband, as he pressed her to his bosom, and kissed her again, and forgave he, "you don't know all the mysteries of the counting-room; and, were I to load your mind with one half the perplexities of my business, you would find

But this is the only instance, that occurs to us, of a happy marriage between American girls and the scions of nobility. Even in a case like that of Miss Patterson who married Jerome Bonaparte, and who, from the wealth and solid distinctions of her family, added to her own beauty, grace and accomplish-ments, might have looked forward to the serene enjoyments of a happy wedded life, a divorce decreed by that imperial tyrant—the first Napoleon darkened a large part of her days, In the case of the lady, now in what is essentially a mockery called the "Counters of Wilhorst," a young girl has to go on to the stage to support an incapable, idle, lazy loafer of a husband who has apparently nothing on God's earth in him or about him but his title. And, by the way, according to the general run of the stories about he manufacture of continental titles, it would seem that any body who can pay for it can buy a countship. We do not suppose. Wilhorst bought his. But of the two kinds of counts that dance attendance among the habitues of our fashionable circles, if our girls must surrender to either, they had better do it to the man who has bought his title. With these last they will be much surer of getting a man who can support his title.

Al-It is full and explicit: there is no symptom of conservatism, no relaxation of sectionalism, and no conceal ment of the means of warfare. Mon ey will flow like water; speeches, and tracts, and all sorts of appeals to the prejudices of a treedom loving peo-ple, will flood the North; and men restriction upon the subject of slaveas to banish all regard to national tranquility; and that rebellion against the laws is not only patriotic, but ed the stamp act and the tea tax in

And what will the Democratic party at Charleston do? Will they be governed by the same sectional ism in behalf of slavery; adopt a platform in favor of Congressional inter vention; nominate a man who will be pledged to such an issue, and boldly risk defeat and certain disorganization? Will they deny the teachings of the patriarchs of of Democrey; resign the powers of the States and man-not poor in property, but poor territories to the general government; foreswear the constitution and its compromises; deny the doctrines which themselves proclaimep in evry national convention since Jackson; and ask Democrats of the North, or of any section, to admit that the right of self-government and of local legislation are henceforth to be disregarded? No-we say no! know that there is a very considerable body of men acting with the Democratic party, who are ready to of fuel that he burned in one winterdo all these things—at least, they would be willing, were it not for the fear of defeat, and the loss of the spoils of office. But these men are not so blind to the signs of the times as to insist upon these things with the prospect of certain defeat; and we do not for a moment doubt that there will be found in the Charleston convention enough of Democratic leaven to leaven the whole loaf; nor that the national and conservative principles of the party, proclaimed at every convention, and most distinctly announced at Cincinnati, will be reiterated at Charleston.

Whom, then, will that convention most probably put in nomination as their standard bearer?

Every reader of the Statesman knows who ought to be the man. Every one of them knows the man who, of all men in this nation, most embodies the time-honored doctrines question of local government for the people, and a national government for the States. No man has ever been so completely the personification of the principles of a great party, and no man occupies so large a place in the popular heart to-day as he. And now, after so many marked indications of character, it is scarcely necessary to name the man: STEPHEN A. Douglas "fills the bill"-no other man can. We believe he will be nominated. Every day brings "conviction strong as proof of Holy Writ." Read the letters on this subject from southern men. Take the tone of the leading papers all over the South, with a few marked exceptions. Take the result of the elections in Kentucky and elsewhere, and see how the sectional men were defeated, and the national ones elected. As to the North, the feeling in favor of Douglas has never been equalled since the days of General Jackson. A full complement of Douglas delegates from the north is a toregone conclusion. He is the great representative man—the national conservative—who occupies the happy mien which is called freesoilism by fire eaters and pra slaveryism by Abolitionists; and he alone appears able to barmonize the conflicts of feeling and opinion which have thrust themselves into the party, and receive the unmination at Charleston with any prospect of success. So be it-Illinois counts eleven!

But the little, mean, and trifling ambitions and esperities of partie, and, my life on it, if you would do that, there would not be so much party in the country as there is. If you could get a President who would devote the whole faculties of his head and the better emotions of his heart and concentrate them upon the idea that he was the representative of the only free government ry is of such momentous importance on the face of the earth, and the one supposed to be the model of all to come after us in all nations of the world, that want to be free-if we could but get akin to the patriotism which resist a man that would elevate himself even upon it, do you believe that the post-master whose office is on some prairie in Illinois (I am speaking of a fact that I have seen related in the newspapers) the proceeds of whose office amounted to three dollars and seventeen cents per annum, gross, (laughter,) who had the impudence to poke his head out of the little log cabin in which his office was held, and say that he thought Stephen A. Douglas was a respectable man, and was overheard by a poor in soul, that had a little starved and miserable soul in him, who wrote on to this mighty representative of the only free country on the face of God's earth, taking care of the liberty of the people of the country—thirty millions them—that he did not like Mr. Douglas while the other man did; that he, the President, would send forth a mandate to that poor little fellow on We the prairies, who was collecting his three dollars and seventeen cents a a year-not a tenth part of the expense some man come in who did not like let me now be holding up Mr. Buchanan as an exception. Such has been too much the case with every President since this party spirit has been so much in vogue. Whig and Democrat, etc., has been guilty of the same sin. I know when you are electing a man to make laws for you, you must elect one whose notions agree with yours; but I do not know that when you have a clerk at Washington, and the Whig party believes that the pen knife he uses ought to pay thirty per cent. ad valorem duty, and that poor clerk has not been able to see that distinctly, although he is a capital bookkeeper and a faithful man, but in his soul and conscience, he thinks it would not be right to pay so much duty as that, that you should turn him out of office, and say he is not fit for a bookkeeper. It is not respectable. I know Tens of that, because I have tried it. No man to establish that duty on the then we will ask him about it.

> THE NEXT PRESIDENCY.—All that is needed now to secure the success of the principles of the Democracy and its candidates in the approaching contest, is the unity of all true men in support of their party, and tealty to its requirements. By these means the successor of our present venearble Chief Magistrate will come into the presidential chair with a majority of the popular vote without a parallel in our history. - Washington Constitution.

> To which the Chicago Times responds:

That is sound. But let the venerable predecessor of the next President evince his sincerity by calling off the animals he has sent out to hunt down the party. Let him tell the men he has thrust into office that they must yield a support to their party and its requirements. Let him tell them that he will not countenance bolters from the party, nor allies of the Republicans Let the venerable predecessor of the next President do this, and he will see a firm united, and conquering Demo-

Unfriendly Legislation.

The Rock Island Argus furnishes a volume of argument, showing the hypocricy of those who denounce Douglas for his "unfriendly legislation" doetrine, by publishing, without word or comment, the following

Those who hold that the territorial egislature cannot pass a law prohibting slavery, admit that unless the territorial legislature pass laws for its protection, slavery will not go there. Therefore, practically, a majority of the people represented in the territorial legislature decides the thousands all over the Union are familiar with the man, and his labors in behalf of the true doctrine of government. His biography will be the question him as to that; but if he is to laws to protect if, as contended for lie sale at the court house door in Sulthe majority of the people, by the action of the territorial legislature, will decide the question; and all said day, for each in hand, to satisfy must abide the decision when made.
